(32点)

- 1 The Rosetta Stone was found at the construction⁽¹⁾ site of Fort Julian in 1799. Purely by accident, a young soldier in Napoleon's army noticed the stone sticking out of the wall. It was named after the town Rosetta in Egypt. The Rosetta Stone was like a messenger whose mission was to open the door to ancient Egyptian civilization. The messages were written in hieroglyphics*, demotic*, and Greek.
- 2 It was assumed⁽²⁾ that these messages were of great importance because the inscriptions* on the stone were actually based on a single text written in three different scripts. The Greek writing was soon decoded by some scholars, and the demotic portion was interpreted⁽³⁾ soon after. But the hieroglyphic text was very difficult. Even though images of this kind had been found throughout the whole area of the Nile valley, nobody had yet been able to read them.
- 3 When you piece together jigsaw puzzles, do sudoku, or play the game of go, you may sometimes get stuck and feel frustrated⁽⁴⁾. If you make a wrong move, you may end up going around in circles. Similarly, it seemed at the time as though the key to reading the hieroglyphics was nowhere to be found. It was J. F. Champollion that made a breakthrough⁽⁵⁾ in decoding the hieroglyphics. He was a French linguist and was familiar with the Coptic*.
- 4 At the initial stage of his investigation⁽⁶⁾, Champollion couldn't find the key to unlocking the code. Suddenly, Champollion had a flash of genius, an idea that would allow almost full decoding of the hieroglyphics. By comparing the hieroglyphics with other separate references⁽⁷⁾, he found two royal names, Ptolemy and Cleopatra. Champollion was sure at least some of the hieroglyphics were letters⁽⁸⁾, not just pictures. This was the beginning of a dramatic discovery.
- 5 Now, thanks to his excellent work, we can travel back to the mysterious land of ancient Egypt. If you visit the Egyptian section of the British Museum in London, you will be able to see the artifact that made this all possible: The Rosetta Stone.
